Title: International law, human rights and transformative justice

The Centre for International Law welcomes innovative research projects focusing on how international and human rights law can accommodate transformative justice. The Centre is particularly interested in those projects that may have a tangible impact on the position of victims of violence, abuse and harm and whose status has been regulated by international law; be it refugees and migrants, indigenous peoples, peoples living under occupation, climate change victims or victims of violent attack. The Centre also invites projects attentive to the way international and human rights law can be used to develop novel strategies to better respond to their situations. It is also interested in projects concentrating on understanding the perspectives of victims and vulnerable persons and how they are living their marginalization. Research collaboration may e.g. focus on the following themes. Does climate change litigation provide answers for those affected by this phenomenon and what are its limits? Can one develop the concept of environmental crimes under international law? How can the extra-territorial application of human rights instruments be employed to better respond to projections of state power affecting vulnerable categories of people across borders? How can due diligence obligations of states and transnational business enterprises be tailored to situations of (post-)conflict or occupation? What have been the short- and long-term effects of international pronouncements by human rights and criminal law bodies on the victims? The researcher will collaborate with the dynamic Centre for International Law at the Faculty of Law and Criminology of the VUB. Located at the heart of Europe it focuses its research and teaching on human rights law, international organizations, and the law of the sea. The Centre focusses on Europe, the global South and their interdependence, which is reflected in the international composition of its staff. Depending on the scope of the proposal the researcher will be able to partner up with many of the PhD researchers associated with the Centre.
